U. symposium on social justice set

Published: November 29, 2007

University of Utah honors students are taking civic engagement into their own hands by organizing and leading a symposium on social justice Friday and Saturday.

The event is a product of the historic and contemporary issues in social justice course at the U. and will demonstrate a student perspective on what the symposium should accomplish.

"As a society, we used to believe that our children would be better off than our parents," said honors student Joseph Bateman. "Unfortunately, we have digressed to an unsustainable point in which in which our children inherit a world with even greater challenges than we face today."

Several issues will be discussed at the two-day forum, the free forum is Friday from 1 to 4 p.m. at the U.'s Hinckley Institute of Politics in room 253 of the U.'s Orson Spencer Hall, and Saturday from 1 to 3 p.m. at the Salt Lake City Library, rooms A and B, at 210 E. 400 South. The symposium is free and open to the public.
