

Politics at the Hinckley Institute

Autumn 1992

First Director J.D. Williams Takes A Look Back

J.D. Williams reminisces about the Hinckley Institute's beginnings.

Politicians were always "off Limits" at the University of Utah, until Robert H. Hinckley stepped forward in 1965 with a large gift to create the Hinckley Institute of Politics.

The Board of Regents permitted a temporary exception to the exclusionary policy in 1960 when it allowed Senator John F. Kennedy, a candidate for President, to address the student body at Kingsbury Hall.

With the establishment of the Hinckley Institute five years later the university went looking for the very politicians it had barred up to that time. The motto of the Institute described the change: "Every student a politician."

Robert H. Hinckley was a long-time public servant who served in the New Deal's Federal Emergency Relief Agency and Civil Aeronautics Administration in the 30s and 40s, and co-owned the "old Blue network," which became the American Broadcasting Company in the mid-40s.

As Bob Hinckley approached retirement from his third career (cars, government and broadcasting), he began searching for his next one. Professor Donald Herzberg, director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University, suggested that Mr. Hinckley find a university where he could set up a political institute. In 1965, in conjunction with the Edward John Noble Foundation, Hinckley took $250,000 to the Board of Regents to establish the Hinckley Institute on the University of Utah campus.

In the summer of 1965, J.D. was called away from painting his garage to come meet Bob Hinckley, his son Robert, and two deans, for lunch at the Fort Douglas Club.

The introductory meeting went especially well since J.D.'s first political hero was former President Franklin D. Roosevelt, the person responsible for taking Robert Hinckley away from state government to Washington. "We hit it off wonderfully," says J.D. Mr. Hinckley then approved J.D.'s appointment as the founding director of the Institute.

Upon his appointment as Hinckley director, J.D. visited several of the country's most prominent educational institutions to study their programs in practical politics. From Yale University he learned about the Chubb Fellowship program in which they sponsor a visiting politician for about a week to "hobnob" with the students.

And from Grinnell College, Iowa, J.D. learned about their practical political education program and saw his first example of a caucus room for students. Grinnell also had pioneered in bringing politicians to campus, including former President Harry Truman and Dwight Eisenhower.

Between 1965-68, during the Institute's formative period, J.D. laid out a program to "keep the excitement of politics in the eyes of the students." He initiated programs such as politicians-in-residence, political internships for students locally and in Washington, D.C. (almost 3,000 strong over 27 years), weekly "Coffee and Politics" discussion sessions, mock political conventions and political movies. Mr. Hinckley financed the construction of a caucus room in Orson Spencer Hall as the locus for many Institute programs. "Books and Banter," a weekly political book review program, became an added feature suggested by Bae Gardner, the AA in the Institute.

J.D. says one of his proudest accomplishments was to hire Bae Gardner, "the mother of the Hinckley Institute," as administrative assistant. He explains she provided a "gentle Republican balance" to his own Democratic leanings.

The Watergate years posed challenges for the Institute and the country as a whole. The Institute experienced difficulty in recruiting young people to enter politics. J.D. then came up with the "existential response" to Watergate: "Would it have happened," he asked students, "if you had been there?"

Watergate created a personal crisis for J.D. in 1973 when, one year early, he publicly called for Richard Nixon's impeachment. The Institute's "Republican money" began to dry up and Mr. Hinckley asked for J.D.'s letter of resignation. He wanted the Hinckley Board to see if J.D. had become "too expensive" for the Hinckley Institute.

But the Hinckley Board unanimously rejected J.D.'s letter. The Salt Lake Tribune editorial the next day commended the vote of confidence, saying (in essence), "We think it appropriate that the director of a political institute should himself be a participant."

J.D. has had other major successes, some of which include presiding over the U's Model United Nations for 13 years, founding the Bureau of Community Development, and obtaining the U of U's Professorship for the celebration of the Bicentennial of the U.S. Constitution from 1985-87. During the 1992 U. graduation ceremony, J.D. received the prestigious Joseph Rosenblatt Award which honors professors who have given a lifetime of distinguished service to teaching, research and administration.

Despite his numerous accomplishments, J.D. says his most rewarding experiences have been his association with his students and his "love affair" with ideas that has continued during his 40-year teaching career. Among his favorite classes were American National Government, The Beauty of Freedom, and the Ethics of Management, a seminar offered through the Master of Public Administration program.

Another exciting year has passed in the Institute's history. Last fall I was invited to spend a semester at Harvard University at the JFK Institute of Politics. It was an opportunity I could not pass up. It was a chance to see another fine political institute (there are only seven in America in operation) to teach a course and to participate in the programs. Programs ranged from entertaining the president of the Ukraine to hearing four of the five Democratic candidates for president. For a political junkie like me it was a rich diet indeed.

Mostly, though, my Harvard experience gave me a chance to innovate some worthwhile programs here at the Hinckley Institute. We have formed a strong student advisory committee, chaired by Paige Peterson, political science junior, which will advise the Institute on all phases of programming. This has already resulted in a search for more internationally oriented internships for students. These students will have more to say about internships, speakers and programs at the Institute. They will provide an important bridge between the Institute and the student-body of the University.

We also have initiated a series of discussion luncheons. Interesting national and local political guests are invited to speak at the Institute at 11 a.m. and, then, to stay for an informal luncheon and discussion. Students, faculty, administration and townspeople are invited. It's a great way to hear about politics — informally and close up.

We are happy to announce the Hinckley Institute has added two new public policy internships to an already broad array of opportunities for our students.

The first is the Frank E. Moss "Caring Internship," named for the former U.S. Senator of 18 years. Its intent is to steer students toward working with social institutions that help those with special needs, such as the homeless or elderly or people with AIDS. Three to four students will serve per year in this competitive internship. The original endowment came via Kem Gardner to honor Moss who is chair of the Caring Institute in Washington, D.C.

The second is the Robert H. Hinckley, Jr. "Environmental Internship," established by Jim Hinckley in honor of his father. This internship will be set up through a state environmental agency, which will help one student per quarter beginning this fall with work on various projects.

As I often do on this page, I wish to thank Hinckley Institute office staff members: Jayne Nelson, Pat Ryan, Dan Jones and Carolyn Allen for making me look good when I was gone. Running an institute by phone and fax is only possible when talented and able people make it work for you. In fact, it was so successful I have thought of moving my office to the Bahamas!

Thanks to all of you — friends of the Hinckley Institute in many, many ways — for your sustaining and dedicated support of the Institute.

Abrelia Clarissa Hinckley Graduate Scholarship for Women Awarded to Second-Year Law Student Hintze

Bridget Hintze, second year U. Law School student, was awarded the Abrelia Clarissa Hinckley Graduate Scholarship for women.

"Everyone deserves legal services," Hintze says. "I want to help people who don't have access to legal advice. Just because you are disadvantaged does not mean you can't turn things around with some help."

Hintze has been visiting Salt Lake County day care sites to evaluate a summer camp program which offers positive role models for children.

Hintze has completed several internships during the past few years, including work in Owens' local office as his personal assistant setting appointments and answering constituent letters; as legislative intern in 1991 with state Sen. Fred Finlinson; as coordinator for the Owens for Congress re-election campaign; and as research assistant for Congressman Wayne Owens in Washington in 1989.

"I firmly believe if I hadn't done my first internship I wouldn't have gotten onto this track and wouldn't have decided to become a public servant," Hintze says.

The political science and economics graduate is preparing to do proactive indigent service for people in need. She says she hopes to intern with the public defender's office or Utah Legal Aid Society after completing her legal studies.

Hintze will receive $3,500 for the scholarship established in 1975 by Robert H. Hinckley as a memorial to his wife, Abrelia Clarissa. It is awarded annually to a graduate woman student whose interests, formal training and life goals include a commitment to politics and community service ideals which guided Mrs. Hinckley's life.

John F. Kennedy Institute of Politics Director Charles Royer Addresses Annual Hinckley Institute Reunion Luncheon

Charles Royer

Charles Royer, director, John F. Kennedy Institute of Politics at Harvard, spoke to luncheon guests at the May 7th Hinckley Institute of Politics Annual Reunion at the University Park Hotel.

The former mayor of Seattle, Washington, and National Democratic Party chair, discussed the rhetorical topic, "Can Students Save America?"

Royer said, as director of a political institute, he spends a lot of time considering how to inspire students who are more diverse than ever before to hold public office in today's difficult climate.

"We're in a period of time where people say to me, "That's too bad," when they find out what my job is. But, perhaps there's no better time to be involved in government."

Royer places his hope in students who he says can make a difference in today's world. You have to be somewhat idealistic, but there are good careers in the public sector.

The mission for the Kennedy and Hinckley Institutes is to put students in touch with the real world. Both have programs to bring in national leaders from government, media and the private sector to inspire students.

Ted Wilson was one of these guest speakers whom Harvard students especially enjoyed, Royer said. (The two former mayors were among some of the first travelers into China after normalization occurred in 1979 when they visited 14 cities in two weeks with eight other U.S. mayors.)

Royer cited the evident disillusionment among the American public with 65-70 percent thinking the country is headed in the wrong direction. They fault Bush for lack of performance and Clinton for problems with honesty, but many like Perot yet don't know much about him.

There is a problem when the Canadian Royal Commission wanted to find out more about political financing in America so they can be careful not to duplicate it, he said. The biggest losers are the American people who have less access to their elected officials than do wealthy campaign financiers.

Instead of asking for candidates' qualifications we ask what they want to get out of it. He says it is this same kind of suspicion and criticism which has caused the best teachers to leave another of society's most important professions.

The result is a massive withdrawal from the system with the best people "bailing out" of politics and would-be voters who don't go to the polls. It is not surprising the "best and brightest" are not interested in careers within the federal government when they see no way to get things accomplished, he said.

Why, then, are some cities able to function quite well? Royer says civic involvement is the key — the more involved people are the better they like their city, and the higher their expectations the higher their involvement and the better the services they receive.

That is what our country is all about — when someone sees things are not right and then does something about it, he said.

"Leadership is the answer," said Royer, who describes the best politicians as those who find something worth losing office for rather than always worrying about reelection. And building political leadership is what the Hinckley and Kennedy Institutes are all about.

Betty Hinckley, daughter of Hinckley Institute founder Robert H. Hinckley, seconded Royer's statement: "When there is great challenge, there will be great leadership."

This year's scholarship and internship award winners were introduced by Bae Gardner, former Hinckley Institute assistant director.

First Certificate in Practical Politics Awarded to Shane Smith

Shane Smith first heard about the Certificate in Practical Politics in Ted Wilson's "State and Local Politics" class. He became the first recipient of the certificate this year after deciding the best way to focus his political science degree into some sort of specialty was to concentrate on campaigns.

As part of his extracurricular practical political activities Smith attended neighborhood get-togethers, filling in when candidates could not be there. He also contacted contributors by phone for several 1988 campaigns, including Owens for Congress, Ted Wilson for Governor, and Taxpayers for Utah.

A non-traditional student, Smith has always believed in the importance of getting a college degree so returned to school after five years in health care administration.

Long interested in practical politics, Smith says the certificate provided a solid direction and exposed him to some classes he might not have taken, such as "Party Politics" and "Group Politics."

"The Practical Politics certificate is a real solid program — I absolutely recommend it," Smith says. "It gives you different areas to explore in government or politics."

Smith plans to go to law school in Spokane, Washington then would like to use his legal degree to do government lobbying or political consulting "behind the scenes."

After 18 months of negotiations with U. Administration to establish the program the Hinckley Institute and Political Science Department now administers the interdisciplinary program in practical politics.

Although the certificate probably will appeal most strongly to social science majors its purpose is to encourage students of all disciplines to enrich their college experience and job marketability by exhibiting knowledge of practical politics.

Work on the certificate can prepare students to be more knowledgeable in political campaigning, political public relations, political advocacy, political lobbying, business and governmental political relations, in measuring public opinion and developing political judgment.

Coupled with a University degree the certificate also can help to develop a deep understanding of the American two-party system.

Students working toward the certificate must meet basic requirements for a Hinckley Internship, maintain a 2.8 grade point average in the program, and meet with the director at least eight quarters, including summer, before graduation to establish a program of study and report on grades.

The program consists of ten courses, five of which are core requirements. The remaining five must be chosen from within a specified cluster group in the area of a student's interest and field of study: Communication/Campaign Management, National Politics, Lobbying and Advocacy (with an emphasis on Women, Minority or Education Advocacy), and State and Local Politics.

Students Win Robert H. Hinckley Graduate Scholarships for Men

Mark Hindley

Mark Hindley, spring 1992 political science graduate with an economics minor, and Clayton Morgan, U. Masters in Public Administration student, won the prestigious Robert H. Hinckley graduate scholarship and study award for men.

Hindley says he has benefited immensely from his several Hinckley internships, which are "practical" rather than "theoretical."

"The Hinckley Institute pointed me in the direction I wanted to go," says Hindley. "My internships gave me experience and opportunities to make choices toward politics and public service."

Some of his experiences have included lobbying with Questar Corp. at the 1991 Utah State Legislature, and assisting with fundraising and public relations at the Children's Museum of Utah.

During summer 1990, Hindley also served as a Hinckley intern with Medical Care Development International, a Washington agency. He worked on sanitation and health care programs for Africa, screening resumes and putting together consultant teams.

That same year Hindley helped conduct research and assisted as volunteer coordinator for the Wayne Owens for Congress campaign. Still later, he headed up the campaign's communication task force consisting of professors and other experts who provided advice on media related issues for debates and political advertisements.

Every position Hindley has held either has paid him or ended up in a job later on.

Hindley will use the $3500 award to attend the U. Law School. He may specialize in international law and hopes eventually to work in the State Department or with the U.S. Agency for International Development as a legal assistant.

Morgan says the Institute is an excellent link between political science and its practical application through internships with "unbelievable connections" all over the country.

"I believe in the unlimited potential of human power — both as individuals and in groups — in the test of persistence," Morgan says. "I truly believe people can make a difference. But it's sad the system has been so insensitive to people's needs largely because of powerful political action committees and mass media advertising."

With the system the way it is, political candidates don't have to answer for their beliefs, he says. Another problem Morgan identifies is a lack of understanding of the political process as one of compromise when "certain candidates come into office thinking things can be done immediately."

"I am a pragmatist," says Morgan. "I don't expect things to happen right away." He claims America is not a patient society. Few candidates are willing to talk about the deficit, for instance. He sees it as a problem that has developed over many years' time which will require long-term changes.

Morgan's past political activities include work with a mayoral campaign and involvement with the U. United Nations Futurists. He also has volunteered with the Rape Crisis Center and Battered Women's Shelter.

After graduating, Morgan would like to work in human resource management or the foreign service.

The scholarship, established in 1983 by Dr. Ben D. Wood, a longtime friend of Robert Hinckley, is given to students who share Hinckley's ideals and seek careers or professional involvement in government or politics.

Eccles Honor Awarded to Paul Jarman

Paul Jarman

Paul Jarman, business senior, has been designated as the 1991-92 George S. Eccles business policy intern for his work with the United States Senate Banking Committee.

During fall 1991, Jarman reported to banking officials on committee hearings he attended, and conducted research for Sen. Jake Garn about lender liability. He also answered constituent letters and worked hard with "meticulous preparations for legislators, sometimes way into the early morning."

Jarman says his Washington internship was worthwhile but that he especially enjoyed the "excitement of being on Capitol Hill where calls come in from all over the country." While he was working in the Senate office, the Clarence Thomas confirmation hearings for U.S. Supreme Court Justice were taking place downstairs.

"Gaining a working knowledge of our government is valuable by itself, let alone going through the process of personal growth that occurs during your internship," he says, affirming Hinckley internship opportunities.

The George S. Eccles Internship in Business Policy is funded through a grant from the George S. and Dolores D. Eccles Foundation. The internship honors Eccles' distinguished career in Utah business.

J.D. completed his tenure as director in 1975 after a very successful first decade for the Hinckley Institute. Stating it was time for "new blood," J.D. recommended in 1975 that Dr. R.J. Snow become the next director. That talented political scientist was followed in 1985 by the Institute's third director, Ted Wilson, the ten-year mayor of Salt Lake City.

When asked if his expectations for the Hinckley Institute have been met, J.D. has a one-word response: "Absolutely!"

In retirement he says he will do his level best to rebuild a two-party system in Utah and work with Utah Issues, a low-income advocacy group, to lobby for the poor.

But J.D.'s retirement plans were put off for six months in the summer of 1992 when the Political Science Department asked him to prepare a twenty lecture course on American government. This television version of P.S. 110 will be broadcast over Channel 9 beginning in January 1993.

"Every citizen a politician" thus continues as a force in the life of the founding director of the Hinckley Institute, Professor J.D. Williams.

Matheson Leadership Forum Sponsors Political Expert Sabato

Larry Sabato, University of Virginia government and foreign affairs professor, visited the University on March 6 as the Scott M. Matheson Leadership Forum Scholar for 1992.

"The quote master of American politics" filled a busy morning schedule speaking about press coverage of politics. He appeared on KSL Television's early morning "Focus" program, then addressed the Hinckley Institute's "Coffee and Politics" forum. During the next hour he spoke to Ted Wilson's State and Local Government class, and later talked about 1992 presidential politics at a luncheon held at the Red Lion Hotel and co-sponsored by the Utah Democratic Party, Utah Republican Party and Matheson Forum.

Sabato, author of Feeding Frenzy: How Attack Journalism Has Transformed American Politics, PAC Power, and The Party Has Just Begun, spoke about the excesses of the media, which in his opinion need tempering. He referred to the Clinton episode with Jennifer Flowers as an example of an overzealous press. He labeled the incident a "feeding frenzy," defined as an incident where a critical mass of journalists cover the same scandal with great intensity.

He chronicled modern journalism through three phases: first, "lap dog journalism," where the majority of uncritical press reports emanated from government press releases; second, "watchdog journalism," where excesses and dishonesty of government offi-

Students Attend Washington Center Seminar in Washington DC

Four University students attended the 1992 Washington Center seminars, "Leaders on Leadership" and "Campaign '92: The Pursuit of the Presidency," in Washington D.C. during winter quarter. Donald Dunn, student intern coordinator, supervised Richard T. Cannaday, John Denning, Heidi Gurgel, and Janel Kolby during their three-week stay.

Seminar students had the opportunity of meeting prestigious and influential government leaders, such as Brent Scowcroft, National Security Advisor, and Frank J. Fahrenkopf, Jr., former Republican National Committee chair. In addition, they listened to the five former Democratic presidential contenders when they visited C-SPAN television studios.

Intern coordinator Donald Dunn says they also had time to take in the sights during off hours. They toured the Kennedy Center, famous national monuments and the White House, and met with Utah's Congressional members.

But, perhaps the best part was meeting and getting to know the approximately 200 other students participating in the seminars from all over the country.

"I would encourage students who are able to become acquainted with Washington through the Seminar program before they serve a quarter-long internship," he says. "But those who can't stay longer can get jazzed up about being an American just by being there and seeing the process in action."

The Rocco C. Siciliano Endowment, established to promote student internships in public policy, funds a portion of students' expenses during the Seminars. Siciliano served as undersecretary of Commerce, assistant secretary of Labor and special assistant for personnel management under former President Dwight Eisenhower.

cial's lives were legitimately reported on as they affected public policy decisions; and third, "junk yard dog journalism," our present situation where the media is harsh, aggressive and intrusive into officials' private lives.

A danger comes when the best people are discouraged from running for office because the boundary between public and private disintegrates, and become unwilling to risk damaging their lifelong reputations.

"We are raising the price of talent to run for office too high," he says. "No one is a saint...everyone has flaws...We need to stop this lowest common denominator journalism."

He explained that today's cynicism arises from the Watergate era and that the focus on character issues is a legacy from former Pres. Richard Nixon's Watergate coverup and the Kennedys' extramarital exploits.

He says news people have limited time, energy and resources and should not waste them on insignificant matters, but instead should concentrate on really important issues, like exposing the Savings and Loan scandal earlier.

Journalists can legitimately report on elected officials money and health matters, police records, relationships with staff or lobbyists or sexual activities that are potentially dangerous, reckless and compulsive, if they affect performance in office. But, he says family members (unless they are using the public position for personal gain) and private matters concerning discreet sexual activity, and minor drug experimentation that occurred many years before, should be shielded from media scrutiny. Every charge should be based upon solid evidence; rumors should not be printed, he says.

Sabato paid tribute to Scott M. Matheson by sharing his memory of the former governor when he was guest speaker at the University of Virginia. He says Matheson, who was able to connect with students by being honest and direct, was a leader in high public office with great integrity.

Biology and Political Science Students Win Matheson Leadership Forum Scholarships

Jeff Bury, political science senior, and Scott Kendall, biology and chemistry senior, won the 1991-92 Scott M. Matheson Leadership Forum Scholarship.

In forming his own unique educational plan Bury has focused his studies on international relations with particular attention to environmental degradation in the Unified States (formerly the Soviet Union.)

He has recently returned from a study abroad trip to the Institute for Central America Development Studies in Costa Rica where he studied Spanish and international development.

Kendall found out about the Matheson scholarship from his brother who was last year's recipient. He plans to pursue a public policy career in conjunction with his science training because, as he puts it—policy affects research. Yet most scientists do not know how to or don't care about getting involved with trying to influence it, he says.

"I got inspired at the annual Hinckley Institute dinner when guest speaker Charles Royer [director of Harvard's John F. Kennedy Institute of Politics] reinforced the idea of students working in public policy," Kendall says. He would like to pull together an agenda to look at the high cost of new teeth as one of the main contributors of rising health care costs.

Kendall currently is working for the U. Pharmaceuticals Department, where he began as an intern. He recently has published a research paper on "Carbon Dioxide Laser Effects on Dissolution Apatite Cements," which explains how lasers can be used to harden cements used to fix teeth — much like the process where natural cements strengthen our teeth and bones.

Bury also has served as a Hinckley legislative intern during winter quarter for Rep. Frank Pignanelli, Democratic Caucus leader for the 1991 State Legislature for whom Bury wrote press releases and conducted research.

"The Hinckley Institute's internship program allowed me to broaden my educational horizons and see available opportunities," says Bury, who was last year's U. student-body vice president. In addition, he has served as a National Collegiate Honors executive council member.

Bury currently is a supplemental instructor in the political science department for an "American National Government" course. He says he would like to continue graduate studies in international environmental studies and eventually teach international relations at the college level.

The competition was worthwhile to Bury because winning the scholarship has meant more time to devote to his studies and less to time worrying about paying for his living expenses.

Kendall says he will use his scholarship money to go to medical school with the hope of continuing his formal training at an academic university, such as the National Institute of Health, or perhaps by working on health issues at the state level. His future goal is to help improve health care for all people.

The Matheson Leadership Forum was established in honor of the late governor, with the goal of enabling former elected officials to reflect, write and speak about their experiences once they have left office. Later, it was broadened to offer scholarships to encourage students toward public service and extraordinary leadership in the tradition of Scott M. Matheson.

Payne Selected as 1991-92 R.J. Snow Public Policy Intern

Suzanne Payne

Suzanne Payne, political science senior, was selected as the 1991-92 R.J. Snow Public Policy intern. She interned with the National Academy of Social Insurance in spring 1992.

"It was the best one available," Payne says of her research-oriented internship. She helped conduct research for the Disability Income Project to secure trust funds for social security.

Payne says she acquired a broad range of skills and knowledge through reading and summarizing articles, answering constituent letters and editing grant proposals.

"The Hinckley internship program is invaluable for anyone interested in public administration, public policy or anything to do with politics," Payne says. "You get on-the-job training you can't pick up from textbooks."

She says she especially liked being in Washington, D.C., where she participated in the "Leaders on Leadership" seminar at the Washington Center in 1991, but also has enjoyed working locally as legislative intern for Sen. Karen Shepherd later that same year.

Another valuable intern experience she obtained was with the Fiscal Analysts Office where Payne updated files, attended and summarized Money Management Council meetings, and helped track how each state agency accesses and spends its monetary resources. She currently is assistant editor for the Utah Department of Administrative Services.

After graduating next Spring, Payne would like to go to Washington as a fund-raiser for a newly elected candidate, or perhaps work again for the National Academy where she has made contacts.

The R.J. Snow Public Policy Internship was established in 1986 by former Hinckley interns to honor the former Institute director of ten years.

Matheson Leadership Forum Recognizes Two with Study Grant

Ross Romero, political science and Chicano studies senior, and Donald Dunn, political science and communication senior, received the 1991-92 Scott M. Matheson Leadership Forum $1000 study award.

Romero interned with the "Hispanic Policy Development Project" in Washington during summer 1992. After he was nominated from among 200 applicants for the "Minority Leadership Fellowship Conference," Romero chose to work in a smaller office so he could develop a broader range of skills.

While there, he helped research unemployment and school dropout rates, and education quality for Hispanics.

"I think I matured a lot, and gained interpersonal and networking skills," says Romero, who will speak at the U's next freshman orientation for minorities held each summer.

"People at the Hinckley Institute are easy to work with," says Romero, who plans to attend law school when he graduates.

Dunn's Hinckley internships have included work with a local school board member's campaign and participation in the Washington Center's "Leaders on Leadership" seminar during the Washington Center Seminar.

He has served on the mayor's youth council. He also is helping to develop Salt Lake County's Youth Volunteer Council, which trains paraplegic Olympiads, and helps with environmental cleanup projects and senior citizens.

"The Hinckley Institute is one of the greatest organizations for students on campus and is unique nationwide," Dunn says. "There aren't many like it where they pay the way for students who might not be able to participate otherwise."

Currently, Dunn is helping to teach several freshman civics and television broadcast classes at West High School. He plans to pursue a Masters in Public Administration and in Education after graduation.

ABC News Bureau Opportunities for Communication Students

Larry Shepherd

Adrienne Goldsmith, senior in political science and communication decision-making, and Larry Shepherd, broadcast communication student, both gained opportunities to work with ABC's Washington News Bureau through a William H. Lawrence Internship.

The "most incredible" part of Goldsmith's ABC internship, she says, was being in Washington, D.C., working "hands on" in politics. Goldsmith was able to learn how government works, a lesson she calls "invaluable" whether or not you are going into politics.

Goldsmith also says she enjoyed the opportunity of working with Hal Bruno, ABC political director, who taught her how to cover primaries and caucuses, and other stories in as "fair and unbiased" way as possible.

And Shepherd says he was able to observe anything he wanted in the ABC radio studios, but that union rules for employees prevented him from direct contact with the equipment. Nevertheless, during his first morning on the job he says he watched Ted Koppel interview former president Richard Nixon.

When asked if he'd do it again Shepherd answers, "Absolutely!" He calls his ten weeks in Washington without his wife and three young children "difficult, but worthwhile," adding with a smile — "My wife made me do it."

Goldsmith also has served a Hinckley internship under KUTV's Rod Decker's direction at the 1991 State Legislature. As his political media aide she "shadowed" the veteran news reporter at meetings and regular visits "to see what's happening" at the Governor's Office.

Goldsmith is convinced that, whether at the local or national level, Hinckley internships are "one of the most valuable parts of the college experience." She believes it is important to get out of the classroom. Currently KSL-TV's marketing and consumer affairs producer, she says her dream job would be in political news production. She plans to earn a masters in journalism or possibly pursue a legal degree.

Shepherd agrees. "As I look at my resume, the time I spent with ABC is definitely a highlight." He says he would like to be a television reporter in one of the larger markets in the Intermountain West.

The William H. Lawrence Internship provides the opportunity to spend winter quarter in Washington, D.C. at the ABC news network with a political/communication emphasis. Competition is held autumn quarter with assignment the following January.

The internship was established in honor of William Lawrence, a political reporter for ABC. Lawrence was a close friend of Robert H. Hinckley, founder of the Hinckley Institute and one of the founders and first vice presidents of ABC.

Three Students Chosen for Siciliano Public Policy Internships

Howard Bagley

Elizabeth Buehler

Brendan McCullagh

Howard Bagley, recent political science graduate; Elizabeth Buehler, elementary education senior; and Brendan McCullagh, political science undergraduate, were named Rocco C. Siciliano interns for 1991-92.

In fall 1991, Bagley designed charts and newsletters at the Senate Republican Conference. During this same time Buehler gave visitors educational tours while interning at the U.S. Supreme Court. And McCullagh worked in the U.S. Office of Legislative and Public Affairs at the National Science Foundation during winter 1991 and spring 1992.

Through his internship Bagley was able to meet the Senate Republican Conference director and the Republican presidential campaign manager. Due to these contacts he now has a paid position as art director for the Bush/Quayle campaign designing logos and ads, and typesetting their publications.

"My internship was extremely helpful," he says. "Without it I wouldn't have had the opportunity to be where I am now. It's the best program of its kind in the country."

Using his artistic talent in combination with his political background, Bagley says he hopes to stay in Washington after the election. He sees future employment possibilities in the White House if Bush wins re-election.

Bagley also has served a local internship with Common Cause, monitoring bills to promote campaign reform and lobbyists' financial disclosures at the Utah State Legislature.

Buehler took advantage of a Hinckley internship opportunity after hearing "good things" about the political institution. She currently is a student teacher, and Bennion Community Service Center project director for the homeless "School With No Name" at the Travelers' Aid Society shelter.

She says she often taught foreign students visiting from Germany, Israel and the Unified States, about historical and current aspects of our country's highest court. Buehler advises even non-political science majors to take advantage of a Hinckley internship because she says it is important for every citizen to learn how our government works.

"Knowing the political process helps with any career," Buehler says. "You find out a lot about yourself when you're on your own."

She also came to gain respect for the court justices, some of whom she met. Justice White shared his overwhelming sense of obligation in his high position, stating that he took his responsibility seriously and attempted to make the best decisions possible.

McCullagh says he enjoyed working at the National Science Foundation upon recommendation of one of his political science professors. In fact, McCullagh thinks he got the best experience available by working for a large agency. He says he learned a lot about the entire budgetary process by attending meetings of five different Congressional appropriations committees and working to obtain basic science program funding.

He also worked on a special "National Science and Technology Week" project targeted at getting school children and the public in general interested in science. During the process McCullagh researched bilingual and other secondary language science instruction for minorities. He says he found most states rely on "mainstreaming," or using the same programs and materials to teach minority students as they do the majority of students without concern for their unique needs.

McCullagh says he also wrote promotional information materials and prepared student packets for schools, science centers and museums. In addition, he helped provide background information for legislative research requests and reported back on Congressional hearings he attended.

"I'd like to see more non-political science students go to Washington to gain an appreciation of how the process can benefit the public good," he says. "Most scientists and science students, for example, are concerned with pure research and not about political/legal/ethical issues — yet they blame politics when they do not receive funding."

Rocco C. Siciliano, U. alumnus and Hinckley benefactor, with his company, ARA Services, established the endowment to fund internships in public policy. Siciliano served in Washington, D.C. as undersecretary of Commerce, assistant secretary of Labor, and special assistant for personnel management for President Dwight Eisenhower.

Trevor Reeve Wins Prestigious Truman Foundation Scholarship

Trevor Reeve, International Studies junior, has won the competitive Harry S. Truman Foundation scholarship awarded annually to approximately 90 students nationwide. At least one student is chosen from each state with up to 40 recipients chosen at large.

Working toward a bachelor's degree in University Studies, Reeve has put together his own broad program of study including economics, political science and finance, with a Russian minor. He also has studied international cultural studies and Spanish during a recent trip to Costa Rica.

Reeve is the chair of the U. Honors Department Student Advisory Committee. Additionally, Reeve volunteers at the University Bennion Community Service Center, where he serves as director of fundraising. He also is in charge of the "Reflections" program, which helps Bennion Center volunteers develop a personal philosophy of service.

Reeve has served several internships, including work at the Governor's Planning and Budget Office, where he helped study interstate migration to and from Utah and at the New York Supreme Court, where he studied alternatives to incarceration.

According to Reeve, the Truman committee asked him some pretty tough questions indirectly related to his education and internship experiences. For example, they asked him to assume he was the top policy consultant for a Russian Republic and discuss his top three policy recommendations to ensure the survival of this country. They also asked him to pick any U.S. political office and discuss his own comprehensive policy proposal to redistribute income and wealth in this country.

Reeve says Hinckley staff members helped prepare him by approximating a similar scenario emphasizing flexible and quick responses. He says the whole experience, though demanding and often surprising, was valuable because it caused him to think critically in analyzing hypothetical issues.

Reeve will receive up to $30,000 total and is eligible to receive $3,000 for his senior year and $27,000 for graduate studies.

Two Designated Ben D. Wood Interns

Robert Henline, political science and philosophy senior, and Reed Sutherland, finance and accounting senior, have been chosen as Ben D. Wood interns for 1991-92.

Henline interned with the Committee for Education Funding in Washington, D.C. this year. Sutherland worked in the training division of PRAGMA, an international development firm during spring quarter.

"I felt uncomfortable at first going into the Hinckley Institute to find out about internship opportunities," says Sutherland, a non-political science student who found the Hinckley staff friendly, nonetheless. "I'm glad I did it — my internship rounded out my college years."

Henline says the aspect he enjoyed the most about his internship was being in Washington for half a year instead of only one quarter. He says the office staff befriended him and helped him learn his way around Washington. He credits the quality mentoring as the reason he was able to develop personally and professionally.

Reed Sutherland

Describing his internship as "incredible," Henline says he helped research budget policy and monitored congressional hearings. He also met with congressional members and their staff about budgetary issues.

"From my internship I know more about the working world is like," Henline says.

Sutherland also enjoyed his hands-on experience with an international firm, arranging travel accommodations for foreign business leaders from developing countries who come to the United States to learn our business techniques. He helped set up an African shrimp marketer's visit with consultants in Florida to learn about their operations.

"It's really an eye-opener to see what works and what doesn't," Sutherland says.

The Ben D. Wood Endowment supports and recognizes outstanding students serving public policy internships in Washington, D.C. Funding was provided through a major grant from Wood, a long-time friend of the late Robert H. Hinckley, with IBM matching funds.

Bamberger State Policy Intern Coordinates 1992 Legislative Aides

Pam Haslam-Hodge, spring political science graduate, was awarded the 1991-92 Governor Simon Bamberger State Policy Internship.

She helped to supervise 30 student interns during the State Legislature, after first training them during fall quarter. Previously Haslam-Hodge served as an intern herself during the 1991 session as assistant to Rep. Frank Pignanelli, House minority leader.

"It was great being up at the Legislature again," she says about her experience in advising students for whom she was responsible. "There's so much going on that is important and interesting to be involved in."

Haslam-Hodge also worked in Washington for the U.S. Conference of Mayors, where she was in charge of the "water bills." She attended meetings for the Clean Water Act's re-authorization, as well as for the Crime and Drug Convention.

"Everyone should be a Hinckley political intern at least once," she says. "Politics is part of our every day life, as Robert Hinckley said."

Currently, Haslam-Hodge is working at the State Democratic Party headquarters as director for the GOTV, or "Get Out The Vote" effort on election day.

She plans to pursue a Masters in Public Administration or in American Government. She hopes to work in an administrative position with a newly-elected government official and would eventually like to teach at the college level.

The Simon Bamberger Internship in State Policy is funded through a grant from the Herbert I. and Elsa B. Michael Foundation, a long-time benefactor of the University. Elsa Bamberger Michael was a direct descendant of Simon Bamberger, Utah's fourth governor from 1916 to 1920.

Bae Gardner Public Policy Interns Named

Antonia C. Novello, U.S. Surgeon General, Jennifer Beer, Dennis Jolley, Laura Wilkins.

This year four students were named as Bae Gardner Public interns: Dennis Jolley, Laura Wilkins, Jennifer Beer and Wendy Lems. All served internships at the U.S. Surgeon General's Office in Washington.

"The Hinckley Institute has a lock on one of the best internships in Washington," says Jolly, a political science senior, who has a strong interest in health care. "You get to work closely with important government officials and not just stand at a copy machine."

At the Surgeon General's Office, Jolly worked with the director of communications and helped with speech writing, which he found especially rewarding. He also helped with office management and scheduling, with interdepartmental relations and research related to congressional requests.

Jolly would like to pursue graduate studies in political communication and behavior, and would like to end up in the political consulting or political advertising field.

The Bae B. Gardner Internship for Public Policy was established in 1990 to honor the former Hinckley Institute assistant director. Past interns have contributed over $10,000 toward the internship endowment fund as a "thank you" to Bae.
